Cutlery with light, thick handles

This cutlery is designed primarily for people with joint problems. This light, thick cutlery is gentle on the joints and relieves strain on the fingers. The handles permit different kinds of grip and sit securely in the hand. Cutting the food is the hardest part. The knife is designed especially to facilitate cutting for users with very little strength. The aim is to extend the time for which the user is able to cut with an ordinary knife.

Cutlery with light, thin handles

This cutlery is aimed for users with impaired muscular strength who need to support their hand and forearm and most often use a pen grip when eating. The cutlery is light and has thin, relatively long handles. This requires a minimum of effort to use, a "placed-between-the-fingers grip" and little movement. The underside of the handle is gently rounded to prevent point pressure.

This cutlery is suitable for users who prefer to use a pen grip when eating.
